Course Information

Course title: Introduction to Cinema
Course number: DRAM2366
Section numbers: 73202
Credit hours: 3 (3 lec.)
Class meeting time: 12:30 – 3:20 PM Wednesday only

Course description: Emphasis on the analysis of the visual and aural aspects of selected motion pictures, dramatic aspects of narrative films, and historical and sociological effect of film as an art.

Course prerequisites: Developmental Reading 0093 or English as a Second Language (ESOL) 0044 or have met the Texas Success Initiative (TSI) standard in Reading.
Required or Recommended Textbooks and Materials

No textbook is required to purchase. The instructor will provide all handouts, additional materials or references. The student needs access to the internet and computer for research and for printing papers and assignments.

Course Objectives

The various aspects of Film are surveyed. Topics include screenplays, writers, directors, actors, artists and technicians. An interest in and a basic knowledge of film will be built by viewing films, through hearing background and backstage lectures, by participating in class discussions, and involvement in projects, classroom presentations and research papers.

Specific Course Learning Outcomes

Students will view, discuss and write about films screened in class. These are films that will not be readily available in most local theaters.

Students will view, research, discuss, and report on films in public venues. Individual presentations will be made to the class on significant films of the student’s personal perspective.

Students will observe how films reflect and react to the cultures which have produced them.

Course Outline

This class is designed primarily for non theatre majors who have an interest in film and want to explore the subject beyond most public venues and to delve into less available and more remote sources to view, discuss and research a broader variety of films. Students can earn 3 hours of college or university parallel credit as an elective or as Core Tier Two credit for Humanity, Creativity and the Aesthetic Experience.

The purpose of this introduction to cinema is to build an appreciation for film, not to entertain the students as an audience. There will be some films screened that are not in color, some not in English, some not even with sound. Certainly, not everyone will like every film. But hopefully everyone will find something that they have never seen before, maybe never even heard of or have known about that will inspire them to look further into the wide variety and depth of film.

Each class will include the screening of an entire film. Most are full length, though none longer than the class period. Each will be followed by a Screening Quiz, or other writing assignment.
Students will be required to rent films and/or purchase tickets to public viewings. A series of homework assignments will cover specific films to be viewed by the student outside of class. These films are considered by many to be classic or important films. These will be relatively easy to locate for viewing by rental, library check out or can even be found on campus for viewing.

Students will also have assignments for class presentations. Some research will be involved so some Internet capability is needed. Each student will need the capacity to print assignments for submission for grading.

The course entirely conducted in class, not online. The student is responsible for proper submission of each written assignment by the due date. All assignments must be printed and submitted to the instructor in class, not by email, online or on ecampus. The final course grade will be made available on econnect, this is the official grade at the conclusion of the course by the following week.
